Stripped Guise

Brandon Dixon

The College at Brockport, bdixo1@brockport.edu

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.brockport.edu/jigsaw

Part of the Poetry Commons

Repository Citation
Available at: http://digitalcommons.brockport.edu/jigsaw/vol2015/iss1/35

This Poem is brought to you for free and open access by Digital Commons @Brockport. It has been accepted for inclusion in Jigsaw by an authorized editor of Digital Commons @Brockport. For more information, please contact kmyers@brockport.edu.
Stripped Guise

Look at the chameleon, changing everything about itself—it’s color, attitude, and thoughts, all to avoid the two moaning teenagers who roll around in the sticky night grass. It slowly retreats to avoid any threat the two interlocked bodies may pose, turning green with envy for the lovers, which helps it blend in and become part of the wilderness.

The boy stops his invasion of the girl’s body to ponder about what will happen when they are done. Will she want to date afterwards? Do I even like her? Does it matter?

He never swears around girls like this one, tells them
he has never looked up boobs on the internet and “gladly” watches any movie that was originally a book written by Nicholas Sparks. His friends call him whipped—he doesn’t know what to call himself.

The chameleon doesn’t change
colors to blend in, like most people think.
The change is a visual signal of mood and aggression, territory and mating behavior. It becomes something else entirely, not because it needs to, but because it wants to.

The wind hisses in his ear and he notices the girl is losing interest.

Reverting back to scumbag mode to appease her, he analyzes every move she makes and her reaction to every move he makes—optimizing her pleasure and fading into the background as he does it.

Is this who I am?