1985

Names in the Mythological Lay Skirnismal

Hilda Radzin
St. John's University

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.brockport.edu/los

Repository Citation
Available at: http://digitalcommons.brockport.edu/los/vol12/iss1/18

This Conference Paper is brought to you for free and open access by Digital Commons @Brockport. It has been accepted for inclusion in Literary Onomastics Studies by an authorized editor of Digital Commons @Brockport. For more information, please contact kmyers@brockport.edu.
The Old Icelandic poetry preserved in manuscripts can be divided into the Eddaic and the Skaldic poetry. The Eddaic poems have mostly free alliteration. Most of the Eddaic poetry is preserved in a manuscript now called Elder Edda or Poetic Edda. This manuscript was written in Iceland A.D. 1270. Its poems are several centuries older, mostly of heathen times. These poems may be divided into mythological and heroic poems. The mythological poems contain stories about heathen gods, words of wisdom, and descriptions of the world.

Four deities are known to have been common to the Germanic peoples: Odin, Tyr, Fró (O.E. Woden, Tiw, Fórn) and Frigg (O.E. Frig). In the Old Norse they are called Aesir. The one-eyed Odin, chief of the gods, is also the most complex. He is master of magic who can restore the dead to life; god of wisdom and rhetoric who has exchanged his eye for a draught of the well of knowledge, stolen from the giants the mead of poetry. From his seat Míðskýlfr, "Gate Tower," he can see into all the worlds.

A second race of gods, the Vanir, were deities of wealth, fertility and peace. Njörðr, associated especially with the harvests of... the sea, dwelling in Nöatún, "Home of Ships," is the male counter-part of the goddess Nerthus, Terra Mater, who was worshiped by tribes along the south Baltic shore (Tacitus, Germania, 40). The ritual of her worship is similar to that of Freyr, son of Njörr. Freyr, "Lord," or Yngvi (O. E. Ing), divine ancestor of the Ingvaesones, was called "God of the World."

An interesting story of the gods is told in the mythological poem Skírnismál ("Words of Skímir"). Sitting in Hliðskjálf, the throne of Óinn, the god Freyr gazes into the world of giants, where he sees the giant maiden, Gerdr, whose beauty makes him sick with love. In the world of the giants (toward the north) was a large and stately mansion which Gerdr was going to enter. As she lifted up the latch of the door, so great a radiancy was thrown from her hand that the air and waters, and all the worlds were illuminated by it. At this sight, Freyr, as a just punishment for his audacity in mounting on that sacred throne, was struck with sudden sadness. On his return home he could neither speak, nor sleep, nor drink, nor did any one dare to inquire the cause of his affliction; but Njörr, at last, sent for Skímir, the messenger of Freyr, and charged him to demand of his master why he thus refused to speak to any one. Skímir promised to do this, though with great reluctance, fearing that all that he had to expect was a severe reprimand. Skímir, however, went to Freyr, and asked him boldly why he was so sad and silent. Freyr answered that he had seen a maiden of such surpassing beauty that if he could not possess her he should not live much longer, and that this was what rendered him so melancholy. "Go, therefore," Freyr added, "and ask her hand for me, and bring her here whether her father be willing or not, and I will amply reward thee." Skírnir undertook to perform the task, provided he might previously gain possession of Freyr's sword, which was of such an excellent quality that it would of itself strew a field with carnage whenever the owner ordered it. Freyr, impatient of delay, immediately made him a present of the sword, and Skírnir set out on his journey and obtained the maiden's promise that within nine nights she would come to a place called Barey, and there wed Freyr. Skírnir having reported the success of his message, Freyr exclaimed:

Long er nótt, langar ro tvaer,

hvé um þreyiak þriár?

opt mér mánaðr minni bótti

en síða hálfr hínótt! 3

Long is one night,

Long are two night-

But how shall I hold out three?

Shorter hath seemed

A month to me oft

Than the half of this longing-time. 4
Scholars have seen an ancient fertility myth in this story. According to this theory, Freyr is the god of fertility and sunshine, Skírnir is a ray of sunshine (Old Icelandic skírr, "bright"), and Gardr (Old Icelandic gardr, "enclosure", "field") is the cornfield held fast in the clutches of the frost giants, demons of winter. The Skírnismál is one of the older of the mythological poems in the Poetic Edda, and probably originated in Norway before Iceland was settled by the Norwegians.

Hilda Radzin
St. John's University
Jamaica, New York

NOTES

1"Edda Saemundar," in Codex Regius, MS. No. 2365 quarto in the Old Royal Collection in the Royal Library of Copenhagen (Copenhagen, 1937).

4All translations from the Old Icelandic language have been made by the author of this article.